PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI
TO THE KENTUCKY SUPREME COURT

Petitioners, Stewart and Anne King, respectfully pray that a Writ of Certiorari issue to review the decision of the Kentucky Supreme Court entered on March 12, 1992.

OPINIONS BELOW

The opinion of the Kentucky Supreme Court is reported at 828 S.W.2d 630 and is reprinted in the Appendix at pages A1 - A18. The opinion of the Court of Appeals of Kentucky is not officially reported, but it is reprinted in the Appendix at pages A19 - A21. The Orders of the Boyle County Circuit Court are reprinted in the Appendix at pages A22 - A28. The Order of the Kentucky Supreme Court denying rehearing is reprinted in the Appendix at page A29.

JURISDICTION

The opinion of the Kentucky Supreme Court was entered on March 12, 1992. A timely Petition for Rehearing was denied on June 4, 1992. This petition is filed within 90 days of that date. The jurisdiction of this Court is invoked under 28 U.S.C. §1257(a).

STATUTORY AND CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS

Kentucky Revised Statute 405.021 provides in its entirety :

> REASONABLE VISITATION RIGHTS TO GRANDPARENTS.
> (1) The circuit court may grant reasonable visitation rights to either the paternal or maternal grandparents of a child and issue any necessary orders to enforce the decree if it determines that it is in the best interest of the child to do so.
> (2) The action shall be brought in circuit court in the county in which the child resides.

The Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution provides in relevant part:

> [N]o state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law . . .

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

Petitioners Stewart and Anne King are husband and wife. They have a single child, Jessica, born April 24, 1987. Respondent W.R. King is Stewart's father and Jessica's paternal grandfather.

Stewart, Anne and Jessica once lived happily together as a family in a house on farmland owned by W.R. King in Boyle County, Kentucky. Stewart was employed full-time at a factory in Danville, Kentucky, but also did work on the farm. As compensation for this work, W. R. allowed Stewart, Anne and Jessica to live rent-free in the farmhouse, and Stewart received a portion of the annual proceeds from the farm's tobacco crop.

W.R. expected a great deal of Stewart regarding operation of the farm and came to believe that Stewart was not putting in enough hours. Stewart was very involved in raising his daughter and believed that W.R.'s demands and interference kept him from spending time with Anne and Jessica. This interference affected both Stewart's relationship with Jessica and his marriage to Anne.

W.R. became upset when sickness to Stewart, Anne and Jessica prevented Stewart from working. On or about September 15, 1988, W.R. told Stewart, Anne and Jessica to leave the farm. Tired of W.R.'s demands, the family immediately did so. Shortly thereafter, W.R. asked Stewart and Anne if he could visit with Jessica. Stewart and Anne denied the request, fearing that W.R.'s domineering personality and his cohabitation out-of-wedlock with Emarine Cash would be negative influences on Jessica, and that W.R. would try to turn Jessica against them.

W.R. next obtained legal counsel, who wrote a letter to Stewart and Anne which threatened a lawsuit and demanded that W.R. be allowed visitation with Jessica. After Stewart and Anne failed to respond to W.R.'s demand, W.R. filed a petition in the Boyle County Circuit Court pursuant to Kentucky Revised Statute ("KRS") 405.021. This statute empowers a court to grant visitation rights to a grandparent if such visitation is in the "best interest of the child." KY. REV. STAT. ANN. § 405.021 (Baldwin 1991).

Stewart and Anne denied the allegations of W.R.'s petition and challenged the constitutionality of KRS 405.021. The trial court declined to find KRS 405.021 unconstitutional, stating that "similar statutes in other states have been universally upheld as constitutional." The trial court also granted W.R.

temporary visitation while the parties, including Jessica, underwent court-ordered psychological evaluation at the local Comprehensive Care Center.

Stewart and Anne filed a motion to alter, amend, or vacate the court's ruling. A second hearing was held, and the court heard further testimony from Stewart and Anne. On January 6, 1989, the court upheld the constitutionality of KRS 405.021 without additional discussion. On the basis of the Comprehensive Care Center's report, the court granted W.R. permanent visitation with Jessica from 4 p.m. to 7 p.m. each Wednesday and Saturday. The court based its ruling on a finding that there were no allegations that it was not in the best interest of Jessica to allow W.R. to have visitation. The court's Order allows Ms. Cash, then W.R.'s housemate and now his wife, who was not related to the Kings at all, to pick up Jessica for W. R.'s visitations under some circumstances.

Stewart and Anne appealed to the Kentucky Court of Appeals. The Court of Appeals reversed the decision of the trial court and remanded with directions to dismiss W.R.'s petition. The Court of Appeals held that W. R. had produced no evidence that it was in Jessica's best interest to have forced visitation with him. "Nowhere in his testimony does he address the child's best interest," stated the Court of Appeals' opinion. The Court of Appeals also concluded that the report from the Comprehensive Care Center standing alone did not satisfy the legal burden. Thus, the Court of Appeals did not reach the issue of the constitutionality of KRS 405.021.

The Kentucky Supreme Court granted discretionary review and reversed the decision of the Court of Appeals. In so doing, the Supreme Court explicitly affirmed the constitutionality of KRS 405.021. On June 4, 1992, the Supreme Court denied Stewart and Anne's Petition for Rehearing without additional discussion.

Jessica has resisted going with W.R. at the appointed times. Nevertheless, the Boyle Circuit Court has threatened Stewart and Anne with contempt of court if they do not hand over the little girl to W. R. The Kings are presently complying with the Court's command.

REASONS FOR GRANTING THE WRIT

I. Introduction

Under the authority of a state law, a Kentucky court has ordered Stewart and Anne King, the happily married natural parents of then one and one-half-year old Jessica King, to surrender their child twice a week to Stewart's father for visitation. There is no suggestion that Stewart and Anne are unsuitable parents for Jessica. Nonetheless, the state now compels them to disregard their little girl's pleas and protests, as well as their own good judgment as to the child's best interests, and to deliver Jessica into the custody of others at specified times. Stewart and Anne petition this Court to strike down KRS 405.021, the Kentucky statute which has deprived them of the liberty to conduct their family life as they deem best, and to reverse the actions of the Kentucky courts which have violated their right to raise their child as they see fit.

II. The History of Constitutionally Protected Parental Liberty

The Kings draw upon a lengthy history of judicial protection of parental rights in the area of bringing up children. This Court has long recognized that the liberty protected by the Fourteenth Amendment includes within its scope a wide sphere of conduct related to the life of the family and the bringing up of children. In 1923, the Court stated:

> While this court has not attempted to define with exactness the liberty thus guaranteed, the term has received much consideration, and some of the included things have been definitely stated. Without doubt it denotes not merely freedom from bodily restraint, but also the right of the > individual to contract, to engage in any of the common occupations of life, to acquire useful knowledge, to marry, establish a home and bring up children, to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, and, generally, to enjoy those privileges long recognized at common law as essential to the orderly pursuit of happiness by free men. Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390, 399 (1923) (emphasis added).

Accordingly, the Court in Meyer struck down a state statute which forbade the teaching of the German language to persons who had not completed the eighth grade.

The "liberty of parents to direct the upbringing and education of children under their control" was reaffirmed in the 1925 case of Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510, 535 (1925). In setting aside a state statute which required all children between the ages of eight and sixteen to attend public schools, the Court declared that, "[t]he child is not the mere creature of the state; those who nurture him and direct his destiny have the right, coupled with the high duty, to recognize and prepare him for additional obligations." Id. In the sixty-plus years since they were handed down, the rationale of the Meyer and Pierce decisions has become an integral part of the American constitutional and social fabric.

Although the scope of the liberty included within the Fourteenth Amendment was narrowed with the demise of economic or substantive due process which began in the late 1930's, constitutional protection of parental rights in matters related to establishing a home and bringing up children has endured. In 1944, the Court stated that, "[i]t is cardinal with us that the custody, care and nurture of the child reside first in the parents, whose primary function and freedom include preparation for obligations the state can neither supply nor hinder." Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158, 166 (1944). It was thus made clear that any judicial retreat from substantive due process as it had been known did not include the area of familial liberty.

Jealous judicial protection of parental liberty in bringing up children has continued into this era. This Court has stated that, "[i]t is plain that the interest of a parent in the companionship, care, custody, and management of his or her children 'come[s] to this Court with a momentum for respect lacking when appeal is made to liberties which derive merely from shifting economic arrangements.'" Stanley v. Illinois, 405 U.S 645, 651 (1972) citing Kovacs v. Cooper, 336 U.S. 77, 95 (1949) (Frankfurter, J., concurring). Based on the long line of consistent supporting decisions, the right of parents to be free of governmental interference in the raising of children was rightfully characterized as "fundamental" in Santosky v. Kramer, 455 U.S. 745, 753 (1982).

As was stated in the 1977 decision in Moore v. East Cleveland 431 U.S. 494, 499 (1977):

> "This Court has long recognized that freedom of personal choice in matters of marriage and family life is one of the liberties protected by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment." Cleveland Board of Education v. LaFleur, 414 U.S. 632, 639-40 (1974). A host of cases, tracing their lineage to Meyer v. Nebraska (citation omitted) and Pierce v. Society of Sisters (citation omitted), have consistently acknowledged a "private realm of family life which the state cannot enter." (citations omitted) (emphasis added).

This Court is now called on to once again give life to the constitutional protection of this important private realm and preserve the basic values underlying our society which it represents.

III. The Importance of this Case

This case is important because the Court is asked to define the boundaries of the long-recognized liberty of parents in the area of raising children. If the statute in question is found to promote a compelling state interest which justifies the abridgment of the parents' acknowledged liberty interest, it is difficult to see where the limit of state intrusion into the life of the family can be drawn. Once it is found that a state may take children from their parents in order to foster relationships with grandparents, the same rationale will support compulsory, state-ordered visitation by other relatives and perhaps even non-relatives. The dangerous potential of Kentucky's statute to undermine the American cultural tradition of parental sovereignty over children is therefore apparent.

Justice Joseph Lambert eloquently summarized the situation in his dissent from the decision of the Kentucky Supreme Court. Said Justice Lambert:

> It could not be disputed that the lives of most children could be theoretically improved by placing them with a more loving, attentive, and affluent family. None would seriously argue, however, that the state possesses the power to redistribute the infant population in such a manner simply because of its perception that a child would be better off somewhere else. Before the state should be permitted to intervene in the relationship between parent and child, there must be a determination that the care of the child fails to satisfy minimum standards. King v. King, 828 S.W.2d 630, 634 (Ky. 1992) (Lambert, J., disserting).

There has been no such determination in this case.

Stewart and Anne King obviously cannot exercise the "companionship, care, custody and management" of their little girl, which this Court has recognized as vitally important, when the power of the state has placed the child under the custody and control of someone else. This statute is radically different than one requiring compulsory education, for example. Though the state can compel some type of schooling, the Kings at least have the right to choose the school their daughter will attend or to teach her at home. In this case, the Kings are deprived of all input over the things their child will do, the values and practices to which she will be exposed, and the way her needs will be addressed when she is with her grandfather. No adequate justification can be provided for a law which tears a small child away from her loving and fit natural parents and vests control of the child in persons the parents have deemed undesirable.

The scope of the liberty protected by the Fourteenth Amendment has been an issue of considerable debate and difficulty throughout the history of American constitutional interpretation. The inclusion of parental rights to raise children free from governmental interference, however, has been a constant in this otherwise uncertain area. In addition to the substantial jurisprudential authority which has long supported this right, the liberty of parents to control the upbringing of their children is deeply imbedded in the cultural heritage of America. The Kings' case cries out for Supreme Court reaffirmation of this vitally important principle.

CONCLUSION

In most instances, grandparents can provide an especially meaningful type of positive support to their children and grandchildren. Sadly, in some cases this is not true. The responsibility for determining what role a grandparent should be permitted to play in the life of a grandchild must, therefore, rest with the parents. The state is ill-equipped to enter this realm and, even if the state were well-suited to such a task, the societal consequences of governmental intrusion in this area are undesirable. If Kentucky is permitted to wrest children from their parents, as has been done here, it is difficult to see where the line restricting state intervention in the family will be drawn. Accordingly, this Court should grant the Petition of Stewart and Anne King and take all action necessary to vindicate the rights and liberty of the parents of Jessica King.

ON REVIEW FROM THE COURT OF APPEALS
V. NO. 89-CA-000207
(Boyle Circuit Court No. 88-CI-000282)

STEWART KING and ANN KING RESPONDENTS

OPINION OF THE COURT BY SPECIAL JUSTICE JAMES H. LUCAS

REVERSING

The respondents, Stewart and Ann King, are husband and wife and are the parents of one child; a daughter, Jessica, born April 24, 1987. The movant, W. R. King, is Stewart's father and Jessica's paternal grandfather.

Until August of 1988, Stewart and his family lived in a house located upon Mr. King's farm which he had built for them. Stewart was employed full time by the R. R. Donnelly Company in Danville, Kentucky, and also worked on the family farm. The home was provided rent-free and, in addition, Stewart received approximately $2,800 per year from the farm's tobacco crop. Mr. King did not feel that Stewart was putting in enough hours on the farm and, subsequently, ordered him to move out of the house, which he and his family did. To summarize the testimony of the witnesses, Mr. King thought his son drank too much and did not do enough work, and Stewart and his wife thought his father was overbearing and intrusive.

While Stewart and his family were living on the farm, Mr. King had almost daily contact with Jessica for a period of some 16 months. After Stewart and his family were asked to leave, Mr. King requested that he be allowed to see Jessica. This request was denied by Stewart and his wife. Mr. King's attorney then wrote a letter to the younger Kings, again requesting visitation with the granddaughter, but again the request was denied.

Mr. King then filed a petition for visitation in the Boyle Circuit Court to which Stewart and Ann responded, generally denying the allegations of the petition and challenging the constitutionality of KRS 405.021. The attorney general declined to intervene. A hearing was held on November 16, 1988, at which time the court referred all of the parties, including Jessica, to the Comprehensive Care Center in Danville, Kentucky, for evaluation, mediation and recommendation. After receiving the report of the Comprehensive Care Center, the court granted visitation by the grandfather with Jessica from 4 p.m. to 6 p.m. each Wednesday and Saturday. The respondents timely filed a motion to alter, amend or vacate, at which time a second hearing was held and the court heard further testimony from the respondents. On January 6, 1989, the court entered its finding of facts, conclusions of law and judgment, upholding the constitutionality of KRS 405.021 and finding that the best interest of the infant child, Jessica, would be served if her grandfather was granted visitation rights.

The respondents then appealed this matter to the Court of Appeals which did not reach the constitutional issue, but reversed the decision of the Boyle Circuit Court on the issue of the best interest of the child. Discretionary review was then granted by this Court.

Two issues are presented on appeal: first, the constitutionality of KRS 405.021; and second, if the statute is constitutional, did the trial court err in finding that the best interest of the child would be served by allowing the grandfather the right of visitation.

KRS 405.021 provides as follows:

> REASONABLE VISITATION RIGHTS TO GRANDPARENTS.
> (1) The circuit court may grant reasonable visitation rights to either the paternal or maternal grandparents of a child and issue any necessary orders to enforce the decree if it determines that it is in the best interest of the child to do so.
> (2) The action shall be brought in Circuit Court in the county in which the child resides.

Counsel for the respondents vigorously argues that the statute in question constitutes an unwarranted intrusion into the liberty interest of parents to rear their children as they see fit. While not being all-inclusive, the Supreme Court of the United States in Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390, 43 S.Ct. 625, 67 L.Ed. 1042 (1923), attempted to define the liberty interest protected by the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States as follows:

> Without doubt, it denotes not merely freedom from bodily restraint, but also the right of the individual to contract, to engage in any of the common occupations of life, to acquire useful knowledge, to marry, establish a home and bring up children, to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience and generally to enjoy those privileges long recognized at common law as essential to the orderly pursuit of happiness by free men. Id. at 399

While the Constitution, as interpreted by the various courts, does recognize the right to rear children without undue governmental interference, that right is not inviolate. Parents are required by law to see that their children are educated. Children must be inoculated against disease. Parents cannot abuse their children. Severe restrictions are placed upon the employment of children. Children must be restrained when riding in a motor vehicle. Thus, over the years, there has been increased legislation guaranteeing the safety, education, and the physical and emotional welfare of children. Under ordinary circumstance, few would dispute that there are benefits to be derived from the establishment of a bond between grandparent and grandchild. While it may be desirable for aunts and uncles and cousins to have a close relationship with each other, our General Assembly has seen fit to protect visitation only by grandparents, and then only if it can be demonstrated to be in the best interest of the child. Our courts have strictly interpreted this provision. The Court of Appeals refused to extend the right to great-grandparents in Cole v. Thomas, Ky. App., 735 S.W.2d 333 (1987), and this Court in the Hicks v. Enlow, Ky., 764 S.W.2d 68 (1989), denied visitation by grandparents if the child had been adopted and when the parental rights of one of the parents had been terminated.

In an era in which society has seen a general disintegration of the family, it is not unreasonable for the General Assembly to attempt to strengthen familial bonds. As this Court observed in Hicks, supra, "the grandparents" visitation statute was an appropriate response to the change in the demographics of domestic relations, mirrored by the dramatic increase in the divorce rate and in the number of children born to unmarried parents, and the increasing independence and alienation within the extended family inherent in a mobile society." Id. at 70 and 71. There is no reason that a petty dispute between a father and son should be allowed to deprive a grandparent and grandchild of the unique relationship that ordinarily exists between those individuals. One of the main purposes of the statute is to prevent a family quarrel of little significance to disrupt a relationship which should be encouraged rather than destroyed.

As noted in Meyer, supra, "The established doctrine is that this liberty may not be interfered with under the guise of protecting the public interest by legislative action which is arbitrary or without reasonable relation to some purpose within the competence of the state to effect." Id. at 400. However, it is not unreasonable for the state to say that the development of a loving relationship between family members is desirable and the arbitrariness of the statute is obviated by the requirement that visitation be granted by a court only after finding that it is in the best interest of the child.

"That the state may do much, go very far, indeed, in order to improve the quality of its citizens, physically, mentally and morally, is clear; but the individual has certain fundamental rights which must be respected." Id. at 401. This statute seeks to balance the fundamental rights of the parents, grandparents and the child.

At common law, grandparents had no legal right to visitation, Jauett v. Rhorer, Ky., 339 S.W.2d 865, 868 (1960). However, the General Assembly determined that, in modern day society, it was essential that some semblance of family and generational contact be preserved. If a grandparent is physically, mentally and morally fit, then a grandchild will ordinarily benefit from contact with the grandparent. That grandparents and grandchildren normally have a special bond cannot be denied. Each benefits from contact with the other. The child can learn respect, a sense of responsibility and love. The grandparent can be invigorated by exposure to youth, can gain an insight into our changing society, and can avoid the loneliness which is so often a part of an aging parent's life. These considerations by the state do not go too far in intruding into the fundamental rights of the parents. Thus, we find that KRS 405.021 is constitutional.

Central to our finding is the protection afforded the child, the parents and the grandparents. If the statute gave the grandparents the unrestricted right of visitation, there would be much less reluctance to declare it unconstitutional. But visitation cannot be granted until an action is filed in Circuit Court, a hearing conducted before a judge or commissioner, and findings of fact and conclusions of law entered finding that the best interests of the child will be served by granting or denying visitation. Fortunately, it is not a common occurrence for this statute to be called into play, but when it is, the parties are afforded ample protection to preclude either injustice or an unwarranted intrusion into the fundamental liberty of the parents and child.

In the instant case, there were two hearings and a psychological evaluation of all the parties before the trial court entered its decree. Jessica's father testified that he had no qualms about his father's ability to love and care for the child. The condition and safety of Mr. King's home was never in issue as Jessica had been left there many times and there appeared to be no question that she would receive proper care during periods of visitation. There appears to be no valid reason that a trivial disagreement between a father and son should be allowed to deprive a grandparent and grandchild from developing the natural affinity so common between these family members.

For the reasons herein stated, the decision of the Court of Appeals is reversed and the order of the Boyle Circuit Court is reinstated.

W. R. KING — MOVANT

ON REVIEW FROM COURT OF APPEALS
V. NO. 89-CA-000207
(Boyle Circuit Court No. 80-CI-000282)

DISSENTING OPINION BY JUSTICE LAMBERT

The issue here is not as the majority presents it. The issue is not whether visitation with a grandparent is desirable and in the best interest of the grandchild. Rather, the issue is whether the state, by enactment of a statute which has as its only standard the subjective requirement of "best interest," may invade an intact nuclear family and require that family to deliver its minor child to another person for visitation. The opinion of the majority makes little pretense of constitutional analysis but depends entirely on the sentimental notion of an inherent value in visitation between grandparent and grandchild, regardless of the wishes of the parents. The fatal flaw in the majority opinion is its conclusion that a grandparent has a "fundamental right" to visitation with a grandchild. No authority is cited for this proposition as there is no such right.

The statement of facts in the majority opinion is not entirely unbalanced, but it omits several facts important to an understanding of the case. As found by the trial court, movant places great demands on his son, Stewart King, respondent herein, to work on movant's farm in exchange for free rent and a portion of the crop proceeds. Respondent's farm work was in addition to a full-time factory job and when he did not perform as his father expected, he was ordered to move from the premises. Moreover, the evidence is clear that movant is an overbearing individual who intruded with impunity upon respondent's family life demonstrating total indifference to their wishes. Finally, the majority fails to mention that movant openly cohabits with Emarine Cash, a woman to whom he is not married, and that the trial court granted Emarine Cash, a woman with no marriage or blood kinship to the infant child, a right to pick up the child for visitation.

There is no doubt that parents have an "essential" liberty interest, free of state interference, in the rearing of their children. Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390, 43 S.Ct. 625, 67 L.Ed.2d 1042 (1923). Such interest has been described as "basic civil rights of man" (Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535, 62 S.Ct. 1110, 86 L.Ed.2d 1655 (1942)) and "far more precious than property rights" (May v. Anderson, 345 U.S. 528, 73 S.Ct. 840, 97 L.Ed.2d 1221 (1953)). In Moore v. City of East Cleveland, 431 U.S. 494, 97 S.Ct. 1932, 52 L.Ed.2d 531 (1977) (plurality opinion), the Court acknowledged an extreme limitation on governmental intrusion into family affairs.

> "[W]hen the government intrudes on choices concerning family living arrangements, the Court must examine carefully the importance of the governmental interests advanced and the extent to which they are served by the challenged regulation."

The right of parents to control the upbringing of their children was expressly recognized in Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510, 45 S.Ct. 571, 69 L.Ed.2d 1070 (1925):

> "[W]e think it entirely plain the [statute] unreasonably interferes with the liberty of parents and guardians to direct the upbringing and education of children under their control . . . ."

In a far-reaching decision, Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205, 92 S.Ct. 1526, 32 L.Ed.2d 15 (1972), the Court held that the legitimate state interest in promoting secondary education was insufficient to overcome the wishes of the parents to the contrary. While the Court's decision in Yoder was based in part in First Amendment grounds the Court noted that such education was

> "in marked variance with Amish values and the Amish way of life; they view secondary school education as an impermissible exposure of their children to a 'worldly' influence in conflict with the beliefs." Yoder, supra.

Relying on Pierce v. Society of Sisters, supra, the Court said:

> "[T]he values of parental direction of the religious upbringing and education of their children in their early and formative years have a high place in our society." Yoder, supra.

The right to family autonomy which had been recognized in various earlier decisions was flatly declared an express right in Santosky v. Kramer, 455 U.S. 745, 102 S.Ct. 1388, 71 L.Ed.2d 599 (1982). In determining what standard of proof was necessary in termination of parental rights cases, the Court forcefully reiterated its view as to the rights of parents in their child:

> "The absence of dispute [that parents have a due process right in termination cases] reflected this Court's historical recognition that freedom of personal choice in matters of family life is a fundamental liberty interest protected by the Fourteenth Amendment. (Citations omitted.) The fundamental liberty interest of natural parents in the care, custody, and management of their child does not evaporate simply because they have not been model parents or have lost temporary custody of their child to the State." 455 U.S. at 753.

The foregoing cases fully demonstrate that parents have a fundamental liberty interest in maintaining an autonomous family unit except in limited circumstances, some of which are identified in the majority opinion, in which the state has been determined to have a compelling interest. There is no doubt that court-ordered visitation with a minor child by one outside the nuclear family amounts to an invasion of family autonomy. The question thus becomes what is the compelling state interest in requiring visitation between a grandchild and grandparent when the nuclear family in intact and functioning in a satisfactory manner.

The majority opinion and the state seem to rely on the idea, in addition to the erroneous belief of a fundamental right in the grandparent, that the lives of the grandchild and grandparent are enriched by their association. While such may be true in many cases, while in others it is not, mere improvement in quality of life is not a compelling state interest and is sufficient to justify invasion of constitutional rights. So long as a family satisfies certain minimum standards with respect to the care of its children, the state has no interest in attempting to "make things better."

It could not be disputed that the lives of most children could be theoretically improved by placing them with a more loving, attentive, and affluent family. None would seriously argue, however, that the state possesses the power to redistribute the infant population in such a manner simply because of its perception that a child would be better off somewhere else. Before the state should be permitted to intervene in the relationship between parent and child, there must be a determination that the care of the child fails to satisfy minimum standards.

Recent Kentucky authority has recognized the > "fundamental, basic and constitutionally protected rights [parents have] to raise their own children and that any attack by third persons (and this would include grandparents in that category) seeking to abrogate that right must show unfitness by 'clear and convincing evidence.'" Davis v. Collinsworth, Ky., 771 S.W.2d 329 (1989).

In Davis, the litigation was between a paternal grandmother and the natural mother. The trial court found the mother to be unfit and determined that the best interest of the child was to place custody with the grandmother. The Court of Appeals and this Court reversed relying on Santosky, supra, Stanley v. Illinois, 405 U.S. 645, 92 S.Ct. 1208, 31 L.Ed.2d 551 (1972), and McNames v. Corum, Ky., 683 S.W.2d 246 (1985). We reiterated the rule that a finding of unfitness must be by clear and convincing proof and described factors which showed unfitness and that poverty alone was an insufficient basis to deprive the mother of custody. Thus, we recognized that a showing of general improvement of the child's life is insufficient to deprive the natural parent of custody. We required a showing of harm to the child by virtue of parental unfitness. There is no reason a similar rule should not be applied in an action for grandparent visitation. Absent a showing of harm to the child, there is no compelling state interest in intervention into the affairs of an autonomous family and any statute which authorizes such intervention violates the parents' liberty interest under the Fourteenth Amendment.

In its opinion, the majority omits the foregoing essential step in the analysis. Rather than focus on the child for possible harm, it makes the per se assumption that deprivation of access to the grandparent is harm. There is no authority for this proposition and it is otherwise illogical.

While court-ordered visitation is an invasion of family autonomy, one may ask why not balance the interests of the parties and require the parents to suffer minor denigration of their rights in favor of the benefits presumed from association between the grandchild and grandparent. The answer to this question is eloquently stated in Bean, Grandparent Visitation: Can the Parent Refuse?, 24 U. Lou. J. Fam. L. 393 (1985), as follows:

> "Some parents and judges will not care if children are physically disciplined by the grandparents; some parents and judges will not care if the grandparents teach children a religion inconsistent with the parents' religion; some judges and parents will not care if the children are exposed to or taught racist beliefs or sexist beliefs; But some parents and some judges will care. Between the two, the parents should be the ones to choose not to expose their children to certain people or ideas, and without a showing that this deprivation has harmed the child in some way beyond a per se disassociation with the grandparents, the family's private decision making should not be tried in a court of equity. Instead, the grandparents' request and justification for visitation should be subject to scrutiny and should be proved necessary to the welfare of the child."

A final point should be made. In 1984, the Legislature authorized courts to grant visitation rights to grandparents. While many children undoubtedly have a close familial bond with their grandparents, other children have close bonds with adult siblings, aunts and uncles, cousins, step-parents and step-grandparents, and neighbors. If the grandparent visitation statute passes constitutional muster, there is no reason to believe a similar statute could not be enacted for benefit of a host of other relatives or even family friends. Under the majority opinion, there is no reason to doubt the constitutionality of a statute, if one should be enacted, which gave standing to virtually any person who claimed to be devoted to the child; and upon a court determination of best interest, allow that person visitation rights regardless of the parents' wishes. Manifestly, such a statute would result in chaos for parents as they attempt to rear their children.

For the foregoing reasons, I dissent.

Wintersheimer, J., joins in this dissenting opinion.

ON REVIEW FROM THE COURT OF APPEALS
NO. 89-CA-207
(BOYLE CIRCUIT COURT NO. 88-CI-282)

STEWART KING and ANN KING — APPELLEES

DISSENTING OPINION BY JUSTICE WINTERSHEIMER

I respectfully dissent from the majority opinion because the trial court was clearly erroneous in finding that the grandfather met his burden of proof. The grandfather failed to prove that forced visitation was in the best interests of the infant child. The majority opinion has misapplied the standard of review and misinterpreted the law.

I agree with the Court of Appeals that it is unnecessary to reach the constitutional questions in this case because the grandfather has failed to meet his burden of proof. The grandfather has produced no evidence that it is in the best interests of the child to require grandparent visitation upon a nonconsenting parent living in an intact family.

This is a particularly fact-intensive case. An examination of the record indicates that the circuit court conducted two separate hearings on the question and ordered the parties and the 19 month old child to undergo a series of evaluations by the comprehensive care center as to the best interests of the infant child and its relation to the parties involved. The grandfather produced no evidence that it was in the best interest of the child to have forced visitation with her grandfather. His testimony does not touch the question of the child's best interests. The only other possibly relevant document in the record is a report by a "certified psychologist with autonomous functioning" which recommends a two-hour visitation period per week. This report does not satisfy the legal burden of proving the best interests of the child. It admitted that the likelihood of preservation of an emotional relationship between the child and the grandfather was based on an assumption and the recommendation was a mere average of the position of the parties not one based on the child's best interests. The evaluator made no mention how the child's best interests would be promoted by visitation with the grandfather.

The trial judge stated in part that there is no allegation that it is not in the best interests of the child that she know the grandfather. Clearly this is a double negative and a rather bizarre twist to the standard of proof which is placed on the natural parents. Such a finding is clearly erroneous because the statute requires an affirmative finding that visitation would be in the best interests of the child. Cf. CR 52.01.

The burden of proof is on the grandfather. The majority opinion also seems to be enunciating a negative standard insofar as there was no question about proper care during the visitation. That is not the issue. The issue is the burden of proof.

The parents are in the best position to know and determine what serves the best interests of their child, and such determination must be given great weight. The grandfather must overcome the initial responsibility of the parent in order to question the decision of the natural parents.

The authorities cited by the majority and the grandfather in regard to the enforcement of K.R.S. 405.021 are based on a totally different fact pattern than that now before this Court. Visitation ordered by a court over the objection of the natural parent in an intact family can be nothing other than forced by the state.

At common law, grandparents did not have the legal right to visit a grandchild over the objection of the parent. American courts followed this rule until the 1960's when states began to grant grandparent visitation rights under certain limited circumstances. All fifty states now have some kind of grandparent visitation statute.

The real issue here is to what extent the statutorily created right of grandparent visitation will be permitted to override the fundamental natural inherent constitutional right of parents in an intact family unit.

It is fundamental that parents are entitled to raise their children in a proper home environment without any interference by the state or other third party. Governmental intervention can be justified only when there is a clear and definite showing that the parental decision would result in harm to the child or otherwise impinge on the child's best interests.

The basis of state intervention has always been some kind of harm to the child and the United States Supreme Court has frequently recognized family autonomy as being entitled to constitutional protection. See Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510, 45 S.Ct. 571, 69 L.Ed. 1070 (1925); Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158, 64 S.Ct. 438, 88 L.Ed. 645 (1944); Ginsburg v. New York, 390 U.S. 629, 88 S.Ct. 1274, 20 L.Ed.2d 195 (1968); Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205, 92 S.Ct. 1526, 32 L.Ed.2d 15 (1972); Santosky v. Kramer, 455 U.S. 745, 102 S.Ct. 1388, 71 L.Ed.2d 599 (1982).

Historically it has been recognized that natural bonds of affection lead parents to act in the best interests of their children. "The Constitutional Constraints on Grandparents' Visitation Statutes", 86 Columbia Law Review 118 (1986), Judith L. Shandling.

Any interference upon the fundamental right of the parents must pass the constitutional test of harm to the child to support a compelling governmental interest which would permit such interference. See 16A C.J.S., Constitutional Law §464(a).

K.R.S. 405.021 gives broad range to the right of grandparents to visit. It is up to the judicial branch of government to safeguard the fundamental constitutional rights of an intact family to unwanted interference from either the grandparents or the state.

In commenting on the Tennessee statute which is very similar to Kentucky's, Sharon F. Ladd "Notes", 15 Memphis State Law Review 635 (1985) wrote, "If the natural parents have a viable marriage, it is not wise to allow parents of either parent to bring suit as this could have a devastating effect on the marriage and therefore the child."

Similar concerns relative to the authority of parents in an intact family to prevent undue interference can be found in Theodore R. v. Loretta A.J., 476 N.Y.2d 720 (1984); Towne v. Cole, 478 N.E.2d 895, 133 Ill. App. 3d 380 (Ill. App. 1985); In re Meek, 443 N.E.2d 890 (Ind.App. 1983); McCarty v. McCarty, 559 So.2d 517 (La. App. 2d Cir. 1990); Thompson v. Vanaman, 515 A.2d 1254, 212 N.J. Super. 596 (N.J. Super. A.D. 1986); Herron v. Seizak, 468 A.2d 803 (Pa. Super. 1983).

The problems incident to a broad statute such as Kentucky's have been recognized by Kathyleen S. Bean "Grandparent Visitation: Can the Parent Refuse" 24 Journal of Family Law 393 (1985-86).

In an appeal from a county court, the Delaware Family Appellate Court gave an extended and careful analysis to the arguments of grandparents in Ward v. Ward, 537 A.2d 1063 (Del. Family Court 1987) which observed in part that the interests of grandparents may be limited when they conflict with the interests of the child's parents. The Delaware Family Court has authority to rule on constitutional questions in that state.

Wisconsin in Van Cleve v. Hemminger, 415 N.W.2d 571 (Wisc.App. 1987) stated that in the absence of a dissolving family relationship there is no justifiable reason for the state to override determinations made by the parents as to what is in the best interests of their children.

Section 2 of the Kentucky Constitution prohibits the "absolute and arbitrary power" over the lives ... of free men ...." Here the parents have a significant liberty interest in the right to raise their daughter free of interference by the state or any other person in the absence of harm to the child. There is no evidence of any governmental interest that needs to be protected in this specific situation.

Here K.R.S. 405.021 is unconstitutional in its application to the right of the parents to raise their child when there has been no demonstration that the child's best interests will be harmed by the decision of the parents. Cf. Saylor v. Hall, Ky., 497 S.W.2d 218 (1973); Pierce, supra.

The Court of Appeals was correct in its decision. Parents in an intact family situation have an inherent constitutional right to raise their child free from interference from any third party, including the state. The integrity, privacy and sanctity of the American family must be jealously protected. The majority decision is a radical extension of the existing statute and as such results in an impermissible interference in the family unit. The parents and their child have been deprived of their right of privacy; the right to be left alone by the state or any third party.

It is unfortunate that the parents and grandparent cannot function as a harmonious extended family unit. Certainly, it is the responsibility of parents to promote and strengthen association between grandchildren and grandparents. However, in certain situations this cannot be achieved and the immediate intact family unit must take priority over the extended family unit. In reaching such decisions, the courts must recognize the best interests of the child standard and apply it reasonably to the specific situation.

I am not unmindful of the need of a right for grandparent visitation in a fragmented family, but no governmental authority or state may use the law to force grandparent visitation on nonconsenting parents living in an intact family unit. Clearly there are situations where the family is deteriorating that need attention. This is not such a situation. This is clearly governmental interference.

I would affirm the decision of the Court of Appeals.

COURT OF APPEALS

NO. 89-CA-000207-MR

STEWART KING AND

APPEAL FROM BOYLE CIRCUIT COURT
HONORABLE STEPHEN M. SHEWMAKER,
JUDGE ACTION
NO. 88-CI-282

W. R. KING — APPELLEE

REVERSING AND REMANDING WITH DIRECTIONS

BEFORE: HOWERTON, Chief Judge, DYCHE and REYNOLDS, Judges.

DYCHE, JUDGE. Appellant Stewart King and his wife Anne, the other appellant, lived in a house on the farm owned by appellee W. R. King, Stewart's father. Along with appellants lived Jessica, their infant daughter, who had a significant and caring relationship with W. R. since her birth; she spent a good amount of time with her grandfather, and he demonstrated the traditional affection for her.

Stewart was employed full time at a local factory, but in addition to this employment, he worked an additional 20-30 hours per week on the farm. As compensation for the farm work, Stewart, Anne and Jessica were allowed to live in W.R.'s extra house rent-free, and Stewart received a portion of the proceeds from the sale of the tobacco crop each year.

In August of 1988 W.R. became dissatisfied with the amount of time Stewart was able to contribute to farm work; a dispute ensued, resulting in W.R. ordering Stewart and his wife and child off the farm. Following their departure, a request was made by W.R. for visitation with Jessica. Both this personal request and a formal request were made through counsel for W.R. and were denied.

An action was filed on W.R.'s behalf in the Boyle Circuit Court seeking court-ordered visitation pursuant to KRS 405.021. That statute, in its entirety, reads as follows:

> Reasonable visitation rights to grandparents.
> (1) The circuit court may grant reasonable visitation rights to either the paternal or maternal grandparents of a child and issue any necessary orders to enforce the decree if it determines that it is in the best interest of the child to do so.
> (2) The action shall be brought in circuit court in the county in which the child resides.

The circuit court conducted two separate hearings on this issue, and ordered that the parties hereto and Jessica (age 19 months at the time of the first hearing and 21 months at the time the final order was entered) undergo "a process of evaluation, mediation and recommendation by the Comprehensive Care Center as to the best interest of the infant child as it involves these parties." At each stage of these proceedings, the trial court urged and cajoled the parties to settle their differences, clearly exasperated at the impasse and its effect upon all concerned.

A final order was entered on January 9, 1989 which granted visitation to appellee twice a week, for three hours each visit. Stewart and Anne now appeal, raising four grounds for reversal.

The first two arguments of appellants raise the issue of the constitutionality of KRS 405.021; the third argument contests the policy decision of the General Assembly in establishing the "best interests" standard in this statute. That third ground is beyond the jurisdiction of any court. Kentucky Constitution §§ 27-29. And, as we decide the case on the issues, it is unnecessary to reach the constitutional challenges.

Simply put, appellee produced no evidence whatsoever that it is in the child's best interest to have forced visitation with her grandfather. The transcripts of the two hearings in this case, combined, amount to seventy-one pages; the testimony of appellee, his only witness, is less than seventeen pages. Nowhere in his testimony does he address the child's best interests.

The only other significant item in the record is a report by a "Certified Psychologist with Autonomous Functioning." That report recommends, as a result of interviews with all four concerned parties, two two-hour visitation periods per week. This document, standing alone, does not satisfy the legal burden of proving best interests of the child.

The order of the Boyle Circuit Court is reversed, and this case is remanded with directions for the trial court to dismiss the petition.

COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY
50TH JUDICIAL CIRCUIT
BOYLE CIRCUIT COURT
CIVIL ACTION NO. 88-CI-282

W. R. KING, PETITIONER,

VS. ORDER

STEWART KING, ET UX, RESPONDENTS.

This cause came on for hearing before the court on November 15, 1988. The petitioner was present and represented by counsel and the respondents were also present and represented by counsel. The court heard testimony.

The facts in this case are basically uncontested. The petitioner (W. R.) is the father of the respondent Stewart King (Stewart) and the father-in-law of Anne King (Anne). Stewart and Anne are the parents of an 18 month old daughter, Jessica King. Until approximately September 15, 1988, W. R. had contact at least every other day with the infant child Jessica and sometimes more often. W. R. has often acted as baby-sitter along with his significant other Emarine.

At the time Jessica was born, Stewart and Anne lived in an apartment over the Minit Mart on Lexington Avenue. Sometime thereafter they moved to a house located on a farm owned by W. R.

Stewart works three 12 hour shifts at Donnelley and then is off for 3 days then works four 12 hour shifts and is off for 4 days. On his days off we worked on the farms owned by W. R. in trade for free rent and a portion of the tobacco crop proceeds. W. R. expected a great deal of Stewart in his participation in the farm operation.

W. R. felt Stewart did not do enough in the farm operation. Stewart believes W. R. so interfered with his life as to negatively impact on his marriage. He resented demands made by W. R.

that precluded him from participating fully in the parenting of Jessica as well as in his marriage to Anne. Hard feelings on both sides resulted.

Approximately September 15, 1988, W. R. told Stewart to pack his bags and move off the farm. Stewart did that immediately. W. R. called Stewart and Anne one time to request visitation with Jessica and was denied that visitation. Thereafter, W. R. caused a letter from his attorney, James F. Clay, Jr., to be sent to Stewart and Anne demanding visitation with the infant child or a lawsuit would follow. No response followed that letter and this suit was filed.

All parties admit that W. R. loves the child and is able to care for her. Stewart believes W. R. may be a negative influence on the child as he may attempt to turn the child against her parents by negative comments made about them.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

The respondents have raised issues of the constitutionality of KRS 405.021. Similar statutes in other states have been universally upheld as constitutional. The respondent's motion to dismiss as the statute as unconstitutional is DENIED.

The issue remaining under KRS 405.021 is a determination by the court of the best interest of the infant child. It is uncontested that for approximately 16 months of the 18 months of this child's life, W. R. was actively involved in her life with the consent of Stewart and Anne. That relationship has been summarily terminated by Stewart and Anne precluding visitation due to their feeling W. R. is to involved in their lives and attempts to dictate their lives as opposed to letting them make their own life decisions.

WHEREFORE, IT IS HEREBY ORDERED:

1. The parties hereto and the infant child Jessica shall, within ten (10) days of the date of the hearing begin a process of evaluation, mediation and recommendation by the Comprehensive Care Center as to the best interest of the infant child as it involves these parties. This is to include psychological evaluations and plan of long term counseling if deemed necessary.

2. The cost of this evaluation, mediation and recommendation shall be paid by the Petitioner in full on demand subject to the court's future orders concerning division costs between the parties.

3. The court reserves ruling on the request of the petitioner for visitation pending the final determination of the court. Such order may be entered after the evaluation process has begun if so recommended by the Comprehensive Care Center. The court also may consider visitation upon request by the petitioner after evaluation process begins.

FINDINGS OF FACT
CONCLUSIONS OF LAW AND ORDER

STEWART KING, ET UX, RESPONDENTS.

This cause came on for hearing upon motions by the respondents to alter, amend or vacate and to hear further testimony. The petitioner was present through counsel and the respondents were present and represented by counsel. The court heard testimony of Stewart King and Anne King.

The court makes the following Findings of Facts, Conclusions of Law and Order.

FINDINGS OF FACT

1. The court adopts the Findings of Fact in this court's order of November 18, 1988.

2. In addition thereto the parties were evaluated at the Comprehensive Care Center in Danville, Boyle County, Kentucky. It is apparent that there is no love lost between the petitioner (W. R.) and respondents (Stewart and Anne). It appears that the concerns of Stewart and Anne that W. R. is unduly impacting on their lives is the basis for their request to deny W. R. visitation with the infant child. There is no allegation that the child is in danger when with W. R. There is no allegation that it is in not in the best interest of the child that she know W. R. All the respondents' allegations concern W. R.'s attempt to demand things of his son, Stewart, that precluded a normal home environment.

3. The court finds that W. R. King and his significant other, Emarine, have had visitation with the infant child pursuant to this court's previous order. They have failed to have the child in a car seat during visitation. Not only is it the law in Kentucky, but it is in the best interest of the infant child that the child be in a car seat at all times and places when traveling in an automobile.

4. It appears that the infant child of the parties is at the baby-sitters until 5:00 P.M. each week day. Anne has been taking off work early in order to pick up the child at the baby-sitters and to have the child at home for W. R.'s visitation. Anne loses pay for no reason. In the future during the visitation with the child, W. R. or Emarine, and no other shall be allowed to pick up the child at the baby-sitters when she is there and then return the child to the home of Stewart and Anne at the end of visitation. Visitation shall continue on Wednesday at 4:00 P.M. to 7:00 P.M. and Saturday's from 4:00 P.M. to 7:00 P.M.

5. It appears that Stewart King when at work at Donnelley & Company works a twelve-hour shift. He then sleeps approximately 10 hours. This visitation with the infant child takes away little if any time of Stewart and his visitation with his daughter. Anne also works and is usually home around 5:30 P.M. This visitation minimally impacts upon her time with the child.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. KRS Chapter 405 as it applies to grandparent visitation is constitutional.

2. It is in the best interest of the infant child that visitation with W. R. King be allowed by this court.

WHEREFORE, IT IS HEREBY ORDERED:

1. W. R. King shall have visitation with the infant child of the respondents on Wednesdays from 4:00 P.M. to 7:00 P.M. and on Saturdays from 4:00 P.M. to 7:00 P.M. If the child is at the babysitter either W. R. King or Emarine Cash may pick up the child.

2. At all times when the child is with Emarine Cash or W. R. King in a vehicle the child shall be in a car seat. Mr. King shall purchase a car seat prior to the exercise of his next visitation. The seat shall be approved by Anne King or Stewart King prior to purchase. If at any time the infant child is not in her car seat when travelling in any form of transportation with W. R. King or Emarine Cash, Anne or Stewart may immediately and forthwith remove the child from Emarine Cash or W. R. King. Further if proof by the preponderance of the evidence indicates that Emarine Cash or W. R. King allows the child to travel in any form of transportation while not being in a car seat the court may eliminate or terminate this visitation.

3. Petitioner shall pay the costs of this action including his own attorneys fees and the respondents shall pay their attorneys fees.

4. Petitioner, Emarine Cash, and respondents shall begin and complete counselling to deal with the unresolved issues of W. R. King's previous interference in respondents lives. The parties shall address and deal with all other issues that may arise during this counselling. The cost shall be paid by petitioner. The parties shall agree on a counsellor within ten (10) days. If they cannot agree the court shall make the choice for them.

5. Pursuant to CR 54.02(l), as amended, and any and all other applicable law, the foregoing order is FINAL; adjudicates all the rights and claims of all the parties thereto, and there is no Just reason for delay.

It is so ORDERED, ADJUDGED, and DECREED this 6 day of January, 1989.
